The Panamanian National Assembly approved Law 412, which updates the business of Trusts Law 23 of 2015 on Anti-Money Laundering (AML), prevention of Financing of Terrorism (FT) and Proliferation of Weapons of Mass Destruction (WMD).

The new law establishes new compliance parameters for companies, strengthens the Non-Financial Subjects Supervision and Regulation and grants the Banking Superintendency additional financial subjects supervision responsibilities.

Law 412 proposes the establishment of a legal platform to promote the local market as a necessary step towards Panama’s consolidation as an international fiduciary center and positioning at the forefront of international transparency standards.

The approval of Law 412 is part of the actions that Panama has taken towards strengthening its legal framework and promoting transparency, by which it will be evaluated in May by the Latin-American Financial Action Task Force (FAFT, or GAFILAT for its Spanish acronym).

Panama will have the biggest GDP-per-capita in Latin America starting in 2018

According to the International Monetary Fund (IMF) Panama will have the the biggest GDP-per-capita in Latin America starting in 2018.

Chile has been, for over a decade, the Latin American country with the biggest GDP-per-capita. In 2018, Panama will slightly exceed the South American country and the difference will grow bigger.

Economist Felipe Chapman stated that he’s not surprised that the IMF estimated Panama as achieving the biggest regional income-per-capita towards the end of the decade, as measured by purchasing power parity (PPP). “This is good news, which gives us the opportunity to continue reducing poverty levels and improving the national wealth distribution, where we still have a long way to go”.

Raúl Moreira, director of Economic Analysis for the Ministry of Economy and Finance, stated that the forecast is given because of the sustained growth and the strengthening of the dollar.
